

I served on the EPPC for as long as Senate rules allowed, chairing or co-chairing it for multiple years. When it is functioning well, it provides the strongest opportunity we have through the Senate to make sure that productive conversations are occurring about our curriculum and related academic matters among faculty, administrators, advisors, and students and that the faculty's views are well-represented. During my time chairing the committee, we made progress on instructional intellectual property policies, online education, the Bachelors in General Studies, the new scheduling matrix and other issues. As Temple faces significant decisions about its educational programs and policies, I would welcome the chance to serve on this committee again.
